October Festival At Appomattox To Commemorate Railroad War

For the South the War Between the States, to its last weeks, remained a railroad war. By January of 1865 the effective Confederacy had been virtually reduced to a man and a city, both supported by a thin web of iron. To Lee and Richmond alike, the remaining railroads of southern Virginia were indispensable. From Lynchburg and the west, the South Side continued to serve Petersburg; from Danville and the Carolina Piedmont the Richmond and Danville still carried supplies to the seat of government. Together they traced across the map a tremulous X, at the intersection of which lay the village of Burkeville. Connecting its eastern termini, and affording direct access between the bulk of Lee's Army and the capital, ran the Richmond and Petersburg. The loss of any of these lines meant the collapse of the whole Confederate position in Virginia.

Grant realized that the railroads of Virginia held the key to victory, and the essence of his strategy was to be the cutting of Virginia's railroad supply lines on a grand scale so that Lee would have to choose between slow starvation in his entrenchments or the abandonment of Richmond and Petersburg. While Grant waited for the federal railroad raids of the winter of 1865 to begin, he lived in daily dread that Lee might secretly move his force by rail to Danville and perhaps prolong the war a year by fighting the back country of the Carolinas. February 27, 1865, is the date that marks the beginning of Grant's final offensive, an offensive bent on destroying the rail lines of Central Virginia: General Thomas led a cavalry force against the Virginia and Tennessee, which linked Lynchburg with the West; General Sheridan's cavalry moved out of Winchester to destroy the railroads north and west of Richmond; and Sherman's army entered North Carolina, to further block north bound supply trains on the Weldon and Petersburg Railroad.

Sheridan's two divisions moved slowly up the Shenandoah Valley turnpike and reached the Virginia Central Railroad at Staunton on March 2nd. Confederate forces of Jubal Early were at Waynesboro, and Sheridan dispatched George A. Custer (two flashy, young calvalry generals to be seen later at Appomattox Station). Early's positon was overwhelmed and Confederate resistance in the Valley ended, clearing the way for Sheridan to destroy the railroads of the Piedmont region at leisure.

Charlottesville was occupied on March 3 and there Sheridan's army broke track and bridges on the Orange and Alexandria leading to Lynchburg and the Virginia and Central leading to Gordonsville. Custer wrecked track and bridges as far south as Amherst Court House, sixteen miles from Lynchburg. another youthful general, Wesley Merritt, led a division to the James River Canal to destroy its locks, embankments, and barges. Sheridans intension was to cross the James River near New Market in order to raid the South Side RR at Farmville near which stood the vulnerable and costly High Bridge over the Appomattox. His designs were thwarted, however, b ecause Confederates burned the bridges over the James and because the river was too swollen to be crossed on the pontoons he had brought for that purpose. He therefore proceeded to destroy rail and brides north of Richmond. The fall of the capital was at hand.

Out of desperation, the Confederate high command evolved a plan. A surprise attack was to cripple Grant's army, making it possible to hold Richmond and Petersburg with a reduced force. Lee was then to move south on the railroad, join Johnston, and crush Sherman. That done, the united Confederate forces could return to defeat Grant. This was purely unrealistic, but it was attempted - and failed. On 25 March, Gordon surprised and stormed Fort Stedman at

Concord Rescue Squad Begins Fund Drive

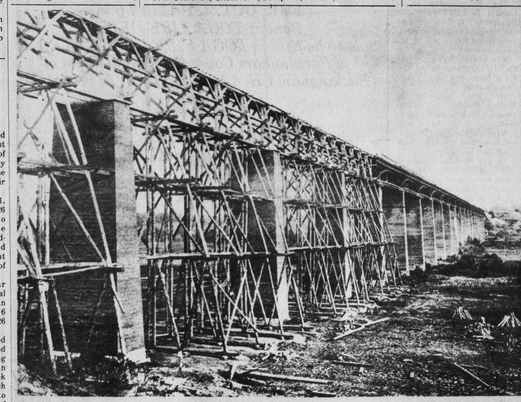
Members of the Concord Rescue Squad have started out in their door-to-door canvass of the people in the areas they serve in an effort to raise $18,000, the goal set for their fund drive this year.

Organized in June of 1971, the Concord crew now has 26 active members and two ambulances to serve the citizens of their area. Headquarters for the Concord Rescue Squad are located at Thomas Terrace on 460 East of Lynchburg.

During the past year members responded to a total of 442 calls, worked 1,339 man hours and traveled 11,476 miles. This is an increase of 126 calls over the previous year.

Posters have been placed advising the people of dates and time they will be canvassing different vacinities. They plan to spend three days each week for 5 weeks in an effort to reach every one in the area and to strive to reach their goal of $18,000.

Members of the Concord Rescue Squad invite each and everyone to stop in and visit their headquarters.



Railroad Bridge Being Rebuilt

Wooden truss bridge of South Side Railroad over Appomattox River was known as High Bridge and was second highest span on North American continent at time of Civil War. Confederates burned bridge during retreat from Petersburg, but Federals put out fire and begin rebuilding operations which helped Union forces cross river and pursue Confederates.
